Response for World War II at Home

The discussion will talk about the American propaganda against the Japanese in the middle of WWII from the cartoon of "Tokio Jokio | 1943 | World War 2 Era Propaganda Cartoon". The cartoon goal is to make the Japanese look weak, dumb, incompetent and show the strength of the United States' army. It is also embedded with some racist depictions of them. To start off the cartoon depicts a chicken taking off their costume and becoming a vulture which depicts Japanese attacks on Americans. It emphasises an unexpected, sudden and emotional moment that brings the US into the war. Several scenes show the Japanese as losing the war having almost nothing left. Such a showcase of Japan's finest air siren shows a Japanese man striking another Japanese man who screams and yells the alarm. The second one is a fire prevention headquarters depicting it as completely burnt. The third one shows Japanese eating their rations in which they have no food and ear eating their ration card. Lastly, it shows a Japanese victory where a ugly man in his underwear trying to keep warmth from a candle. There is also another batch making fun of the Japanese people/customs. The first shows Japanese emperor Yamamoto as short needing walking sticks to increase his height. The second depicts a Japanese human torpedo humoring their suiside tactics. Lastly, the busiest American ship with several crashed (suicidal) Japanese planes in it. In the end the cartoon plays many humorous scenes and tells of propaganda for the war effort against the Japanese.
