

Nickolas Diaz

Dr. Patrick Luck

AMH 2010.01

April, 13 2026

Response for the Civil War II

This discussion will talk about how Lincoln's decisions impacted the United States, after the civil war, in the texts of "A Formerly Enslaved Man, Recalls Fighting for the Union" and "Abraham Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address". To start off, in Lincoln's second address, he framed the Civil War as divine punishment for the collective sin of slavery, and calls for national unity and repairing the nation. It was a smart move for the sake of the nation; if he had imposed punishment, the two sides would have been further divided, and the economy of the south would have been destroyed. It put the nation on the path of rebuilding instead of fighting over the already resolved issues. In the recalls fighting in the union, It tells of a man called William Henry Singleton who escaped to Union lines. He tried to volunteer the army but got denied, instead of giving up, he recruited one thousand former slaves and trained/drilled them using cornstalks instead of guns. After meeting with Lincoln, he allowed the regiment to fight in the war. At the time having colored men join the army was never heard of, colored men did not have many rights in what jobs they could do. They are viewed as inferior and thus will receive worse job opportunities than white men. Lincoln's decision to let them into the war broke society's norms, demonstrating that blacks can work just as well as whites. In the wake of the war, blacks are able to do jobs they never imagined before because Lincoln allowed it.