Response for the Great Society

This discussion will talk about the key values of the Republican party point from the text of "Barry Goldwater, Republican Nomination Acceptance Speech (1964)". Goldwater is big on his foreign policy, being strong on communism. He heavily criticized the past administration for being soft to the spread, stating the complete failure of Berlin, Bay of Pigs, and Vietnam. His motto "moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue." The quote means being timid/compromising on justice is a failure in a person's morals. Essentially republicans believe the spreading of communism is a direct attack on the United States and world peace. Goldwater valued a limited government, believing that the bureaucracy is too big and bloated; a bigger government also allows a high amount of corruption. He states that the government has too many jobs that are useless, and there are too few people who profit off of their governmental power. Lastly his policy is fixing urban crime, and domestic violence saying that the previous administration poorly enforced crimes and allowed tyranny to be common. If the government cannot protect its citizens from bullies, then a communist revolt will happen. All three policies have mainly one thing in common, preventing the destruction of America. The threat of communism is out of control and could destroy the US from the inside. The big government produces lots of waste, inefficiencies and corruption. Lastly criminals are running rampant and the people are less protected from crime.
