Response for Jim Crow Segregation

This discussion will talk about the advice that Booker T. Washington and W.E.B. Du Bois gives to black people in the texts of "Booker T. Washington & W.E.B. DuBois on Black Progress", and how they directly contradict each other. Washington talks about how blacks should be smart with their situation, instead of being emotional about the racist circumstances that they are in, he advocates blacks work on one's self and gain wealth through training in specific fields. The idea is if enough black gain wealth and self reliance it would automatically translate into better civil rights for blacks. On the contrary DuBois points out Washington's flaw, that black accepting their situation has actually made civil rights worse. He argued that blacks should prioritise using their political power to change the law, protest any instance of racism and embrace education. The big problem with Washington's approach is that blacks were seen as less capable and needed to be told what to do. DuBois advice shows that blacks are just as capable as every race and can stand for themselves. It directly disproves the white man's opinions and gives them a second thought when they discriminate against blacks.
