Response for Mass Immigration and Urbanization

This discussion will talk about how the industrial revolution created a bigger divide between the poor and the rich, “The Biography of a Chinaman” and “How the Other Half Lives”. Jacob shows an extremely cruel life living in New York being improvised, detailing the overcrowded, unsanitary living environments, packing many families into one living quarter. The industrial revolution created so many riches for many Americans that they don’t even know about the cruel conditions that would shock the wealthy population. This is a huge disconnect that previously never occurred due having so much wage production and less land owners. In the biography of a chainaman, describes a disconnect in terms of discrimination of being a Chinese immigrant. He describes a society where many Americans can treat them badly due to having less of a fighting population, poorer/wage workers, different customs like clothes and recreation and jealousy due to being cheaper than American workers. In the end both texts describe a situation where the higher class treat the lower class inhumanly more than ever before the revolution.
