Response for the Postwar Civil Rights Movement

This discussion will talk about the racism in the 1950s and how activists documenting their troubles might change American's racism from the texts of "Rosa Parks on Life in Montgomery, Alabama" and "Selections from Martin Luther King Jr Letter from a Birmingham Jail". To start off both authors describe their endless encounters. Rosa Parks describes their community members murdered and lynched without any investigations and no publicity. She experiences racism daily at every encounter, such as bus drivers not stopping for blacks, having separate and worse lounge for shopping, not being able to eat at a restaurant and being denied at tailor shops. Dr Martin Luther King Jr had to explain to his own 5 year old daughter, "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?". He says that people do not respect backs, no one calls him Mr. and instead call him boy or the n word. Describing these accounts of racism does not intuitively help their cause to stop it. The demographic of people who don't know the struggles of racism are now informed on what is occurring. They are more likely to have empathy towards them, instead of seeing a difference between the races they will connect with blacks after seeing their daily struggles. By reading the tragedies towards blacks they will be less tolerable of it. The other demographic of people who are already racist, they might begin to question themselves on how they were raised as a racist. It gets them thinking about where their behavior came from and they keep being that way.
