Nickolas Diaz

Dr. Patrick Luck

AMH2020

September, 2 2026

Response for the Roaring Twenties

This discussion will talk about how Herbert Hoover views in favor a smaller deregulated government over a larger socialist government, from the text of "Principles and Ideals of the United States Government". To begin with, Hoover noted the progress made during the Republican administration, which favored a small government. Saying the past seven and a half years of Republican rule have been unprecedented. Despite a loss caused by a war, a lot of debt, and inflation, they recovered with an economic boom, going from 4 out of 10 automobiles to 9. Hover defined his version of a small government that it should be hands off in the business sector yet hands on in many other areas. For example the government should not subsidize industries like farm relief and electrical power, while still keeping subsidies over non-business related things like the military or humanitarian aid. The core idea of his belief is the idea that progress is going so fast that it would be more beneficial to the common people if less overhead was applied to businesses. No doubt the benefits that were gained from improving industry is hundreds of times more than any rights that could be gained from regulation. This idea has a single flaw, although it is logically sound, the problem is with the fact that having a small government is the only way to have this kind of growth. It is overgeneralised that there is not enough info about what would have happened if other policies were applied. For his idea to be true the negation would need to be If America did not implement a small government then unprecedented growth would not have happened. Which makes Hoover's argument look weaker.