Response for the Second Industrial Revolution

This discussion will talk about the idea of how financial liberty is argued to be a fundamental right like the freedom of speech, in the texts of "Henry George, Progress and Poverty, Selections". The Henry George text says that the unequal distribution of land causes poverty and poverty itself strips a person's right to liberty and justice. As land becomes more scarce, people are forced out of owning and have to work to support a living. The problem is that there is so much competition looking for work, that it causes a huge amount of people to go into poverty despite the industrial revolution creating so much wealth. A right for financial liberty would fix this problem; it would force any work offered to pay reasonable wages. The industrial revolution brought Americans from a time where most have land to profit on, to the poor not owning any. A switch from guaranteed land to a decent wage is absolutely needed for modern times liberty.
