Response for World War I

This discussion will talk about the details of Woodrow Wilson's argument for going to war against Germany from the texts of "Woodrow Wilson Requests War", and "Alan Seeger on World War I". Starting off, Wilson is in favor of war, saying that German submarines have sunk American ships and hurt American allies. He might be stretching this point so that his argument will appear stronger, the war probably had little to no impact on the economy of the US. Secondly he argues that going to war is morally the right honorable thing to do. Calling the German empire imperialistic, selfish, and autocratic and defeating them would bring the world global peace and liberty by converting them into a democracy. He depicts the US as morally superior and even with no monetary value gained from entering the war, the reason is to do what is right. The downsides of going to war that Wilson has to consider is that war is horrable. Alan Seeger who is an American who joined the French, describes the horrors of war, saying that it is absolutely miserable, they are starving and freezing and spend months in a hole doing nothing. Most people and most likely the president romanticize war, thinking it will be easy only to be surprised at how bad it really is. If people knew this information, the support for going to war would vanish. It could show hypocrisy in how the president is forcing the poor to a war they never chose to be in and the president having a comfy life. In the end Wilson made the choice to sacrifice many Americans for the greater good of the world.
