Response for World War II Abroad

This discussion will talk about the mentality of the anti war movement in WWI of Americans from the text of ‘Charles A. Lindbergh, America First” and the picture of “American cartoon by Dr. Seuss: 22 May 1941”. The American people are mostly isolationists, believing the country should avoid foreign wars and alliances and focus instead on its own internal divisions, such as national defense. As WWII began, they naturally saw involvement as not their concern rightfully so as it was halfway across the globe. The anti-war movement was highly against FDR, believing he was pushing an unwilling public to a foreign war. They believed a foreign war would weaken the US, it would cost a lot of lives and resources to do so. Furthermore,a reason for no action was the belief that the US was impenetrable due to its two massive oceans. Simply put, the prospect of Germany or Japan potentially invading the US seemed unfathomable. The movement argued that if the US declared war despite most Americans being against it would mean that democratic system is a failure. The very nature of a democratic system is that it takes action based on the majority ruling, and a contradiction to this would mean that the people are not being represented. Lastly the picture shows a mentality of the US, delay in helping the allies and only get involved when it suits the US. A delayed involvement means less fighting and less of a stake to lose, and fighting a weaker enemy.
